

Dear Editor,

Pakistan's Future: A View from Toronto

As a resident of Toronto, Canada, and a keen observer of global affairs, I am writing to share my perspective on the future of Pakistan, a country with which many Canadians share deep ties, including those served by Darwin TV, Toronto, which broadcasts Pakistani and international news in Urdu.

Recent reports from institutions like the UN, ADB, and IMF offer a glimpse into Pakistan's economic trajectory. Projections for GDP growth in 2025 range from 2.5% to 3.4%, signalling a cautious but hopeful recovery. It's encouraging to see efforts aimed at stabilizing the economy, with declining inflation and a renewed focus on attracting foreign investment, particularly from overseas Pakistanis. The government's "Vision 2025" outlines ambitious goals, from improving human and social capital to boosting sustained growth and strengthening governance.

However, the path forward is not without its challenges. Political stability remains a crucial factor, and consistent implementation of reforms is vital to sustain this nascent recovery. While the economic indicators show some promise, the benefits must translate into tangible improvements in the lives of ordinary citizens, addressing issues like poverty and job creation amidst high population growth.

Culturally and socially, Pakistan continues to be a vibrant nation with a strong sense of community and generosity, as highlighted by its ranking among the world's most generous countries in the World Giving Report 2025. This intrinsic social fabric, coupled with a youthful population, presents immense potential for innovation and progress. The increasing focus on digital infrastructure and the digital economy, as noted by the World Bank, offers a significant avenue for future development and empowering its citizens.

In my opinion, Pakistan's future hinges on its ability to navigate its complex political landscape with a focus on long-term stability, prioritize inclusive economic growth that benefits all segments of society, and leverage its rich cultural heritage and human capital. Continued investment in education, particularly for women, and creating a conducive environment for private sector growth are paramount.

As a Canadian, I believe a prosperous and stable Pakistan is in the interest of the wider international community. We in the diaspora can play a role through investment and continued engagement, supporting initiatives that foster progress and stability.

Thank you for providing a platform for such discussions.

Sincerely,

Javed Amed
